I am from a family of teachers. They taught all sorts of branches of academia; languages, literature, sciences, geography, philosophy... so I had a great time at school and my thing was mathematics.

As a child I was always thinking, some would say my head was in the clouds. I was also fiercely competitive, I spent a lot of time playing chess with my dad, as well as any game against anyone. As a teenager, I developed a strong taste for justice of all kinds and enjoyed philosophy. I did tend to make very quick decisions (for better or worse) - I grew up with an older brother who was rebellious and very political, as well as a 'model child' older sister who was very protective of me.

My main weakness is that I can be very careless, but I usually get away with it through a combination of wits, physical prowess or sometimes sheer luck. I like to have a small social circle of at most a dozen very close friends and have good relations with my parents. Currently I am thinking of starting my own family.

Hello there,

Firstly, I am happy that you are born and made it this far, I was right to trust science. I have high hopes for you and can only assume your parents' love was enough to make you amazing.

Not knowing you and being at this point, from the past, I can't give you any brilliant advice apart from "be good and have fun". I will keep on cheering for you. Good luck in life - it always helps, even if you don't need it.
